Preacher Ponderings

Chuck Schultheisz – Aberdeen, Washington

On my way into town the other day, driving past one of our infamous bikini barista coffee huts, I noticed an unusual amount of traffic and commotion around the stand, including a long line of cars waiting to place their order. Must be free coffee day, I wondered. So, on my way back home, passing the stand again, the reason for the commotion and backup was clearer. A van at the window had its hood up with a large car-hauler facing it and several fellows leaning into the engine compartment.

I had to chuckle. This would be my luck, were I ever to take a notion to visit one of these pink coffee shacks. I'd pull up to the window, praying that no one I knew had spotted me, and my car would die. No wonder the poor sap had the wrecker service in front of his van – after all, you probably don't want to call your wife in that situation and have her come get you, and something tells me the girl in the bikini isn't going to know much about alternators or fuel pumps.

But what struck me as interesting, in addition to the van with the hood up, was the line of five cars behind him, whose occupants were so intent on seeing what they wanted to see, that they would patiently wait in line. I mean, the coffee just can't be that good, nor the show that captivating.

Sin is an interesting creature. When we're tempted through our own lusts, we know that there exists that possibility that we could really get busted. We could get caught. We could find ourselves in a very embarrassing situation. It could be revealed to all the world around us what our otherwise hidden desires have been. But the devil somehow persuades us that it's all worth taking that chance. "Afterall," he whispers into your ear, "there's always that chance that you will get away with it."

Sin can be so enticing that you're willing to wait patiently for it to come to you. You're not going to flee from the devil, as the inspired writer James instructs. No – you're going to literally wait in line for your turn with him. And the fact that giving in to his temptation didn't work out so well for the guy in front of you in line doesn't really bother you. "That's just him," you reason, "It won't happen that way to me. I'll get my kicks, my satisfaction, and life will go on peachy from there."

Satan is a liar and evil to the core to be sure, but he's not stupid. He's actually quite a smooth operator. He knows who the stupid one is, and he entices accordingly.

Avoid every kind of evil. 1 Thessalonians 5:22
